There aren't any easy answers for this one. There is/was a general thought that multiple records for different formats present a source of confusion or frustration to users. Many libraries have opted for the "single record" approach in the past (including my own). This was particularly useful in the era of text-based OPACs, a...

Apart from fixed fields (which your OPAC may or may not apply), one record needs a gmd and one does not. That is sufficient reason for us to create two records. Unless you wish to introduce compound gmds, e.g., 245$h[text & electronic resource], I would suggest two records. That's wh

Amy: In the long run I think it's best to have separate records as it facilitates batchloading e-resource MARC records from vendors and publishers, and it parallels what is done with services like Serials Solutions and ebrary.

In anticipation of an implementation date of August 1, 2009, the Provider-Neutral E-Monograph MARC Record Guide has been posted to the BIBCO Web site: http://www.loc.gov/catdir/pcc/bibco/PN-Guide.pdf. Thanks to Provider Neutral Task Force members Becky Culbertson, Yael Mandelstam, and George Prager for preparing the guide. The document contains background information, a metadata application profile (MAP), and examples to guide BIBCO and other catalogers in creating provider neutral e-monograph records.

Definition

A provider-neutral e-monograph record is a single bibliographic record that covers all equivalent manifestations of an online monograph. Manifestations are considered equivalent if their format and their content are essentially the same, based on clues from the author, title, edition, publishing information, and physical description. Another separate record is needed only if the cataloguer determines that another online version, because of substantial differences (e.g., in content or subject), really represents a different manifestation. There will also be some cases where the resources are considered equivalent even though the titles that appear on each resource differ.

What are the types of online monographs for which it is used?

The provider-neutral e-monograph record has been defined for monographs that have the same content available by one or more providers. The monographs may be issued as born-digital resources, current simultaneously-issued-with-print editions, or scanned reproductions of previous existing materials. A provider-neutral record should be created for online monographs even if no equivalent manifestations exist at the point of cataloguing.

http://www.loc.gov/catdir/pcc/bibco/PN-Guide.pdf p. 10

Why do we need it?

Current monographic cataloging practice in the Anglo-American world requires the creation of a new record each time a new publisher, aggregator, or distributor provides online access to the same electronic resource. As a result, many duplicative MARC records for online resources are created in shared cataloging systems such as OCLC. Catalog users often have difficulty understanding the rationale or the subtle differences between multiple records when searching through a cluster of very similar electronic resource records. The creation of one record that can be used for as many aggregations as possible will improve search and retrieval in online catalogs. Moving to the provider-neutral model puts the emphasis on the content of the resource, and not the provider.
