Building Diverse Collections in Religion and Theology
Suzanne Estelle-Holmer, Yale University
Amy Limpitlaw, Boston School of Theology
Michelle Spomer, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary

ABSTRACT The past year has brought renewed attention to the need for academic library collections to support an emphasis on diversity, equity, and inclusivity (DEI) in the curriculum and to reflect the increasing diversity among students and faculty. The urgent calls for maximum inclusivity and diversity in all aspects of theological education have led collection development librarians to re-examine and re-calibrate their collecting practices. Three librarians offer practical suggestions on how to approach the challenges of developing diverse collections by engaging with key stakeholders, aligning collecting with the institution’s mission and/or vision statements, utilizing approval plans, and promoting collections through outreach and diversity programming.

SUPPORTING DIVERSITY IN THE CURRICULUM AT YALE DIVINITY SCHOOL
Suzanne Estelle-Holmer, Yale University
Issues of diversity, equity, and inclusion are not new to our profession, yet there is still relatively little literature devoted to the challenges of developing diverse general collections in an academic context (see bibliography below). Some of this reflects the slow pace at which our institutions have admitted new voices and perspectives into academic discourse and, hence, into the curriculum. However, the events of the past year, including the rise of the Black Lives Matter movement, the murder of George Floyd, and the devastating effects of the COVID-19 global pandemic on racial minorities and the poor, has hastened calls for change in theological education. Much of this work has focused on a re-evaluation of the curriculum. At the Yale Divinity School, the number of minority faculty rising in the ranks has increased over the past ten years, and we now have faculty who teach Black and Womanist theology, ethics, and preaching, as well as Asian theologies and Latin American religions. This has enabled the school to offer courses every semester on topics that treat specific religious or ethnic groups. However, the call is now for diversity, equity, and inclusion (DEI) to be a major component of most, if not all, foundational courses. This offers the collection development librarian the opportunity to partner with faculty and students to systematically explore new areas of collecting. Building diverse collections is a tangible way that the library can contribute to a school's DEI efforts. Here I describe some preliminary steps to take in determining priorities and next steps as your institution implements more diverse curricular offerings.
Where to start? If you are in a university context like Yale, diversity can be overwhelming. You not only support the collection development needs of a seminary or divinity school, but also those of other academic departments and a global network of scholars who also rely on your collections. There are multiple constituencies and topics to cover and not only the contemporary American scene, but historical and global aspects. Diverse theological collections should include:

- Publications that engage issues of power, race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, and disability
- Publications representing a variety of theological perspectives
- Publications that reflect the lived, religious experiences of people of different faith traditions
- Publications by authentic authors and about underrepresented groups
- Publications that are global in scope, possibly in multiple languages

To avoid running around in too many directions at once, I recommend laying the groundwork by taking a deep dive into the curriculum. By now I hope that theological librarians have access to course syllabi, but I realize this is still difficult in some contexts. If you don’t have access, make a case with the curriculum committee or the academic dean that this is a valuable resource for keeping current and planning for needed course materials. Any new materials not in the library should be ordered, whether for required reading or recommended readings. I like to think of course reserves as ensuring equality for all students in the course. The library’s provision of course reserves ensures that every student has equal access to the essential reading required to succeed. However, the library’s role doesn’t end there. To provide equity, reference works and other research materials must be selected with knowledge of assignments, papers, and other course requirements. These additional materials, like commentaries, reference works, and scholarly monographs, shelved where they are visible and easily accessible, ensure that students have an equitable opportunity to do well.

Does your school have diversity requirements for students? At Yale Divinity School (YDS), M.Div. students have two requirements they must fulfill for graduation:

- Every M.Div. student is required to take one course in a non-Christian religion or one course in the relationship between Christianity and other religions.
• Every M.Div. student is required to take one course that either focuses on or integrates in a sustained way material on class, gender/sexuality, race/ethnicity, disability, and/or global/cultural diversity. This course may also include material on globalization.

At YDS, the onus is on the faculty member to demonstrate that their course meets the diversity requirement when the syllabus is submitted for review by the Curriculum Committee. If your school has similar requirements, you may want to concentrate your collecting efforts on these courses.

Finally, I would like to mention a special initiative at YDS that allowed me to gain meaningful insight into the curriculum from the faculty perspective. YDS has a curriculum committee composed of the academic dean, faculty, students, and a librarian. They meet regularly throughout the academic year to approve syllabi for new courses and to draft policies relating to requirements and scheduling.

This year, as part of the Dean’s anti-racism initiative, he asked the Curriculum Committee to review the entire curriculum with an eye to guaranteeing that all students would have significant exposure to anti-racism topics while at YDS. The faculty met in teaching groups to evaluate courses in their areas and to make recommendations for change. Each group was asked to reflect on the history of their discipline, evaluate whether their introductory courses met the school’s commitment to equity, and to point to a particular course that was exemplary with regard to diversity. Many of the disciplines represented are not those viewed as being particularly diverse, at least not traditionally, including philosophy of religion, biblical studies, ethics, and liturgical studies. Some interesting themes ran through the comments offered by the faculty:

• Almost all acknowledged privileging of Eurocentric, male, white, Christian voices both in the founding and the present composition of the disciplines and in its literatures.
• Many concluded that although the disciplines needed to be open to new, diverse voices, the classic works should not be expunged, but redeployed and re-examined from new perspectives.
• Some admitted that the inclusion of “diversity” topics and readings had been relegated to discussion sessions with teaching assistants and not as part of the professor-led course sessions, signaling to students that this material was of lesser value.
There is now a greater commitment to rethinking diversity in the introductory courses. What this indicates is that diversity will increasingly be a major component of theological education, even in the foundational courses that traditionally have highlighted the thought of white, Eurocentric scholars. Librarians have a critical role to play in these changes, which will radically change our library collections.

DIVERSIFYING THE COLLECTION AT THE BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY LIBRARY

Amy Limpitlaw, Boston School of Theology

The Theology Library at Boston University primarily serves the BU School of Theology. The Library’s efforts toward creating a collection reflecting a diversity of perspectives and voices are directly related to the School of Theology’s larger commitment to diversity, equity, and inclusion, especially as this commitment took shape in recent years. While the BU School of Theology, embracing its self-designation as the “School of the Prophets” (http://www.bu.edu/sth-history/), has enjoyed a long history of attentiveness to issues of social justice, in recent years the School further deepened its explicit commitment to diversity, equity, and inclusion. A brief history of how this came about and the impact on the Theology Library is in order.

The move towards a more explicit commitment to diversity began at a community town hall in 2015. A group of students presented a letter demanding greater diversity among faculty hires. This demand arose after the departure of the sole Black female LGBTQ faculty member. Over the next few years, the School took steps to respond to this challenge. First came the creation of a steering committee on diversity, equity, and inclusion. More focused conversations on the issue were undertaken during community town halls, meetings, and surveys of the community. In 2016, the School instituted a permanent Office of Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion; and a Diversity Statement (http://www.bu.edu/sth/about/diversity-statement/), outlining the School’s explicit commitments on this issue, was drafted that same year and voted on and adopted by the faculty in 2017.

The Diversity Statement as adopted makes explicit reference to work of the Theology Library:

The School of Theology will therefore endeavor to nurture a community culture that values inclusive diversity in all its forms, while paying particular scholarly and social attention to the intersectionality of race, gender, sexuality, physical ability, learning differences, and global origin, reflecting the strengths of our faculty and staff. To fulfill this mission, the School of Theology will... expect scholarship from people of various races, genders, sexualities, physical abilities, learning differences, theological perspectives, and global origins to be taught in classrooms and, to this end, encourage the STH library to reflect increasingly this diversity in its collections [emphasis added].

The Library in turn has taken steps to affirm the seriousness with which it takes this charge, first by incorporating language from the Diversity Statement into its own mission statement (http://www.bu.edu/sthlibrary/about/):

...in support of the School’s commitment to diversity, equity, and inclusion, the Library strives to build a collection that includes works from scholars of various races, genders, sexualities, physical abilities, learning differences, theological perspectives, and global origins.

The Library also reaffirmed its commitment to developing a diverse collection of resources in its collection development policy:

Finally, the Library seeks to build a collection that comprises a diversity of voices and perspectives, including (but not limited to) scholarship from and reflecting the perspectives of people of various races, genders, sexualities, physical abilities, learning differences, theological perspectives, and nationalities.

The actual task of building a collection that “comprises a diversity of voices and perspectives” involves more, of course, than mere statements expressing said commitment. The Library is still working toward this goal, but certain steps have been taken. One step is simply to pinpoint some of the key call numbers and call number ranges as helpful tools for locating and acquiring resources that either deal with issues of diversity or may reflect the scholarship of underrepresented ethnic, racial, gender, and other groups. In Appendix A below, we provide a list (not exhaustive) of some of these call numbers and call number ranges.

Another step is to consider books published in series, either for purchase as individual titles or for subscription to the series as a whole as a standing order. Many publishers are now seeking to highlight the scholarship of underrepresented groups. Book series such as “Asian Christianity in the Diaspora” (Springer-Verlag), “Majority World Theology Series” (Langham), and “Celebrating Faith: Explorations in Latino Spirituality and Theology” (Rowman & Littlefield) center the work of scholars from distinct backgrounds. A list (again, not exhaustive) of some of these book series being published is provided in Appendix B.

The work of the Library in this direction has also been aided by the challenge to faculty to take steps to implement a diversity of voices in their course readings. Syllabi for new courses are reviewed by a faculty committee and returned to faculty members if the course does not include a sufficient diversity of assigned readings. The Library always makes sure its collection includes both required and recommended course readings, so the work of faculty to include a diverse selection of voices in their course has in turn helped the Library to improve the diversity of its collection. Moreover, new courses focused specifically on issues of social justice in relationship to diversity have been created in recent years, and this has likewise led to the acquisition of more resources focused on issues of diversity, equity, and social justice.

The Library also solicits input from the community in the work of collection development. Faculty requests and recommendations of course take priority, but student input is also welcome. The challenge to the School to embody its commitment to diversity came from students, and students have provided some of the most valuable input to the Library in terms of helping the Library diversify its collection. One example of this is the graduating class of 2016, which decided to make their class gift a donation of funds to the Library so that the Library could purchase books related to the theme of “Power, Privilege, and Prophetic Witness.” (https://library.bu.edu/sthspecial-collections/classgift2016) Students who donated to the gift fund were given the opportunity to choose a title to be added to the Library’s collection, and this collection in turn became the basis for further acquisitions focused on social justice, diversity, equity, and inclusion.

While the work of building a more diverse collection continues, there is the important work of sharing and promoting the collection. This has been undertaken by the Library staff in a number of ways, including the creation of LibGuides. The Library’s collection of LibGuides includes the following:

• African-American and Womanist Theologies
• African Theologies
• Asian and Asian-American Theologies
• Disability Theologies
• Evangelical Theologies
• Feminist Theology
• Interfaith Studies
• Latinx Theologies
• LGBTQIA Resources and Queer Theologies

New acquisitions are also highlighted at monthly faculty meetings, as well as on the Library’s web site. (https://library.bu.edu/sthnewbooks) And finally, library staff utilize social media such as Twitter and Facebook to highlight diverse collections.

While responding to the challenge to enact its commitment to diversity, equity, and inclusion remains, the Library continues to take steps to build a more diverse collection.

DIVERSITY PROGRAMMING AT BARBOUR LIBRARY
Michelle Spomer, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary

So, you’re intentionally building diversity into your collection – how, then, do you connect these resources with library users? How do you foster rich conversations around these resources? This is where library programming comes in, and specifically, diversity programming. This includes drawing attention to and engaging with library resources by and about people with diverse experiences, including (but not limited to) people of color, the LGBTQIA community, people with disabilities, and ethnic, cultural, and religious minorities.

Why Diversity Programming?
There are several reasons to consider diversity programming:

• Collection Promotion
  First, various types of programming can draw attention to and increase usage of specific resources. Probably, many of you are already promoting your collections through displays, new acquisitions lists, and other means.

• Mission Support
  Diversity programming in the library can support the mission of your institution. While your institution’s mission statement may not directly include something about diversity, you may find the idea of diversity in vision statements, core values, strategic plans, or position statements.

• Curricular Support
  Diversity programming can, of course, support the curriculum. There may be learning outcomes, course assignments, courses that focus on diversity issues, and guest lectures that would all benefit from programming.

- Institutional Initiatives
  Diversity programming can also complement institutional initiatives. For example, the Pittsburgh Seminary board has recently identified the need for seminary-wide anti-racism initiatives. This initiative has included diversity training, reading groups, and guest lectures, all of which could be supported by library programming.

- Partnerships
  Lastly, diversity programming can be a catalyst for new relationships, and can undergird the variety of programs and events hosted by your institution. Barbour Library has developed fruitful collaborations with the Writing Center, student groups, and Continuing Education. There are several other groups that we hope to partner with for future programming.

Diversity Programming in Barbour Library

Diversity programming in Barbour Library has really only been happening for about one and a half years, all pre-COVID. Here are a few highlights of what's been done in that time period:

- Events
  Barbour Library has been fortunate to collaborate with two student groups to provide robust programming that included book displays, bibliography handouts, receptions, and online guides. The two student groups are Rainbow Covenant, which supports students in the LGBTQIA community, and Syngeneia, a group that supports students of color. Both collaborations included the following elements:

  - Library Resources
    Library staff collaborated with members of both groups to review resources already in the collection, and to identify items that could be added.

  - Bibliography Handouts
    A resource list was generated, and print handouts were included in the book displays for people to take with them.

  - Resource Displays
    All four endcap display units around the second-floor atrium were used to showcase collection resources, all of which could be checked out.
• PTS Community Receptions
The seminary community was invited to a reception in the atrium area, where they could view the book display, enjoy refreshments, and speak with members of the student groups.

• LibGuides
The final element was creating LibGuides for library users to use well after the event and after the displays were taken down.

• Displays
In addition to the two events described above, library staff created standalone resource displays that were focused on diversity themes. These included displays for the 150th birthday of Mahatma Ghandi, Native American Heritage Month, and for a seminary event (2020 Kelso Community Conversation on Race and Faith). The first two displays were gleaned from online calendars that list such events (some of these are included in the bibliography for this session). Taking a look at event calendars at your institutions will often yield events that can be complemented by diversity programming.

Ideas for Future Diversity Programming
Barbour Library staff are looking forward to developing more diversity programming. Here are just a few diversity programming ideas for consideration.

• Diversity Plan
Many academic libraries have diversity plans that include goals related to strategic planning, welcoming spaces, recruitment and retention of diverse staff, library programming, instruction, and collection development. If you Google “library diversity plan,” you will find many examples of such plans.

• Interactive Displays
While there are many ways that displays might be interactive, one example that lends itself to diversity programming is a display based on the Race Card Project (https://theracecard-project.com/). Library users are asked to distill their thoughts, experiences, or observations about race into one sentence that has just six words. The sentence is written down and then displayed in some way for other library users to consider.
• Highlight Resources in the Catalog
  Barbour Library’s online catalog homepage includes links to resource lists for various collections (such as new books). A list for diversity resources could be added.

• Displays Designed by Library Users
  Why limit the development of displays to library staff? Students, faculty, staff, and local community members could all be potential resources for creating displays.

• Movie Nights with Discussion
  Space in Barbour Library is a bit limited, but a movie night with discussion could be done on a small scale. There are any number of movies with diversity themes that could spark thought-provoking conversations.

• Art Exhibits
  There are several spaces in Barbour Library that would be great for displaying the work of local artists who touch on themes of diversity.

• Speaker Series
  Barbour Library has just started three different speaker series, all of which could host speakers from diverse backgrounds and/or speakers who engage with diversity issues.

• Performances
  Music, dance, and other types of performances could take place in a variety of spaces in Barbour Library.

• Social Media
  Currently, the library has very little exposure through social media platforms. Diversity events and library resources could be promoted via Facebook, Instagram, Twitter, and other platforms.

• Special Collections Exhibits
  While we are currently without an archivist, there are a variety of items in the seminary’s institutional archives and special collections that could be used for exhibits with diversity themes.

We are looking forward to planning for more events and programming in Barbour Library centered around themes of diversity. Please
